School Gobblers Finish Course, Head for Thanksgiving Tables

College careers of 45 turkeys ended this week when poultry husbandry students of El Camino College weighed them for the last time before sending the gobblers on their way to star on Thanksgiving dinner tables.

Although no diplomas were issued upon their graduation, these birds when roasted a golden brown will ably testify to the efficiency of the students and their instructor, Leo M. Christian.

Each poultry husbandry student, in order to gain practical experience in his chosen field, is required to conduct an individual poultry project either at home or on campus. As his project, Malcolm King, a Scotsman with a thick Irish brogue who arrived in Gardena from Canada last Labor Day, is employed by a local poultryman. He plans to establish his own poultry business.

Feeds Studied
In order to produce top-quality birds, correct housing and proper feeds and feeding procedures were studied in detail. As the birds neared marketable age, emphasis was shifted to the importance of careful grading.

Because the marketing of poultry is a highly competitive field, according to Christian, even turkeys of good quality have little sales appeal unless they are carefully graded and packed.

"Therefore, the correct use of government standards and grades for dressed turkeys is stressed," stated Christian, "although we do not as yet have facilities here for dressing them."

Miss Wilda Nylen, supervisor of food services at El Camino purchased 15 birds for use in the school cafeteria. The rest of the flock was sold to a local buyer. As the original poulters were bought by the school, all profit from these sales will go into the general school fund. A plan is now being evolved whereby students may share in the ownership of such projects; as part-owners they will receive a fair share of the profits for their efforts.

Grading Uniform
Christian further explained that government standards do not change to meet local or temporary market conditions but they do assure the producer of uniform grading. From the standpoint of the consumer, a label that gives the correct grade is a valuable guide when selecting a turkey, he emphasized.

"A housewife should check the age of the turkey she selects by feeling the keel bone," the instructor advised. "Flexible cartilage that moves easily back and forth on the end of the bone denotes a young bird. If the bone is hard and rigid the turkey is mature and will require a longer roasting period to make it tender. Young birds can also be recognized by their fine-grained, soft flesh and velvety skin," he added.

Other day and evening courses offered by the agriculture department of El Camino College are chinchilla production and management, animal husbandry, poultry feeding, poultry housing and equipment, plant propagation, ornamental trees and shrubs, and nurserymen's techniques.
